Learning focus

Rights are justified claims, freedoms or entitlements recognised by moral principles, laws or political institutions.

1. Rights create duties for others or public authorities. They may be civil, political, social, economic, cultural, individual or collective.

2. Human rights are commonly described as universal and inherent to all people. Their practical protection depends on laws, institutions, remedies and public accountability.

3. The United Nations Charter and Universal Declaration of Human Rights are central international milestones. The Universal Declaration was adopted in 1948; it is a declaration, not itself a treaty.

4. International human-rights treaties and monitoring bodies complement domestic systems, but enforcement can vary and states may dispute interpretation or compliance.
